On the other hand, the St.The possible influence of heroin induced diabetic neuropathy on platelet aggregation. In this study, it was investigated whether the ability of the sympathetic nervous system to cause platelet aggregation is changed in heroin induced diabetic neuropathy (HIND). Two groups of patients have been enrolled in this study. Group I: 40 diabetic neuropathic patients, and group II: 20 diabetic patients without any neurological complication (controls). A nerve conduction velocity (NCV) study and a score on Neuropathy Disability Score (NDS) were carried out in the aforementioned patients, and a screening study of plasma adrenaline (epinephrine) and noradrenaline (norepinephrine) levels was carried out on those with NCV >50 m/s. In group II, NDS was correlated with the levels of plasma adrenaline and noradrenaline, measured after the following propranolol (a beta-adrenergic blocking agent), epinephrine and nor-adrenaline infusion. The treatment with beta-adrenergic blockers in both groups, during the epinephrine and noradrenaline infusion, did not affect significantly the aggregation studies. No difference was found in plasma adrenaline and noradrenaline levels between the groups. In diabetic neuropathic patients, but not in controls, a correlation was found between NDS and adrenaline levels (r=0.54, p=0.005) but not between NDS and noradrenaline levels. In conclusion, our study showed that adrenaline is the neurotransmitter which is mainly responsible for the platelet activation in diabetic neuropathy.Q: Is there a similar method to.Find() for HTML?
