Biting and capture of rotifer nematodes from a flagellated and ciliated free-living protist population. Nematodes of the genus Rotifer are widely distributed in freshwater and marine environments. A large part of their life cycle takes place in association with flagellated protists such as the ciliated rotifers and mixotrophic flagellates. Although Rotifer species have often been studied separately, their ecological interaction with flagellated protists is poorly understood. In this study, the behavior and/or chemical attraction of two naturally occurring nematodes, the copepods Pseudomonas rotifer and Aulacoplana mobilis and their protist prey, was quantified. The presence of nematodes resulted in a higher proportion of flagellated rotifers, suggesting that nematodes actively target specific flagellated populations. Rotifer hatching success was significantly higher with the presence of A. mobilis than without, and the presence of A. mobilis increased the hatching success of P. rotifer to a similar level as copepods alone. The direct contact of nematodes with flagellated protists was observed. Rotifer hatching success was higher in the presence of protists than in the absence, and the copepods showed the highest hatching success when feeding on A. mobilis prey. The presence of flagellated protists was detected in rotifer encapsulations. These results indicate that nematodes actively target specific flagellated populations, that nematodes hatch faster in the presence of specific flagellated protists and that the presence of specific protists stimulates the hatching of rotifer eggs, thereby leading to higher population densities, especially when the rotifer is also food-limited. return v.IsNil() case reflect.Int, reflect.Int8, reflect.Int16, reflect.Int32, reflect.Int64: return v.Int()
