I know that curved lines are more realistic, but I would like to make a curved line look more realistic for the output produced by my software. A: There's no hard rule that can be stated as such. But you're of course free to define "realism" more or less, and if you want to you can test various input and output images and see how a given method of curve deformation moves things closer to the "ideal" you want. I don't know what sort of "realism" you had in mind. In general, natural-looking curves are made by trying to match some property of the underlying linear surface, and altering that to look more natural. Basically, you have a curve like the first one you mentioned (convex inner and convex outer), and a curve like the second one (concave inside and convex outside), and you make them similar to each other by making either the inside concave and the outside convex, or the other way around. A: You're right that if you want a "natural" looking curve, you want to make the interior concave, and the exterior convex. It depends on what you're trying to do. If you're looking for a curve to match the shape of a specific object, then you want to fill the space inside with a concave region, and outside with a convex one (or vice versa, or both). If the concave/convex cross-section of the curve matches the shape of the object at any one point, that's a more natural-looking curve.
