We have become a nation of listeners, keeping our ears occupied with the sounds of whatever device we are using. While pre-recorded music has a wide variety of styles that cater to our whims, such music still does not have a voice all its own. That is about to change, though, as a company in Canada is working on developing technology that allows computers to create vocals. The company behind the technology, "Someday," is trying to create technology that allows computers to make up voices for advertisements and other pieces of music. The technology, called Vocalic Harmony, is a software program that works by identifying the pitch of the human voice through a microphone. It then constructs a melody from different sets of syllables that are created by combining different pitches together. This sounds to be similar to one of the current favorite experiments of artificial intelligence. In the past, robots have been able to "talk" to humans via text messaging, e-mail, and now an app known as Siri. It is believed that if robots are built with the ability to talk to humans, then they will be able to create songs and melodies that would be recognizable to those who are familiar with human music. That may sound like something out of science fiction, but a music studio in England has already created this technology. In fact, the technology was even used to create a virtual artist known as "Aurora." This artist has the ability to sing melodies and songs that are composed through the use of Vocalic Harmony. Of course, there are no songs yet, but there is no telling what the future has in store for this technology. For now, let's just hope that our computers have the willpower to deliver for us. I've been in love with the iPhone ever since it was released almost six years ago. The ease of use of the phone has been one of the main reasons for its popularity. It' 09e8f5149f
