Polyurethane foams are widely used in packaging, insulation and automotive industries. Typically, these foams are produced by mixing a polyether, a polyisocyanate and a catalyst in a continuous mixing device. The polyether and isocyanate blend is combined with a low boiling point solvent in a separate mixer. The resulting polyether-isocyanate prepolymer, which is reactive with the polyol (i.e., a polyhydroxy compound), is charged to the high pressure mixing head, also known as a static mixer. The polyether reacts with the polyisocyanate to form polyurea polymeric foam. The static mixer serves to disperse and thoroughly mix the reactants and prevents unwanted reactions from occurring. The art has used mixing heads having complex geometries, which are produced by molding the head in two halves. To form the static mixer, these halves are ultrasonically welded together. Subsequently, the weld and edges of the mold are trimmed to produce a flat edge. As such, the resulting head is not rigid, but is flexible, and has a concave lower surface. The two halves of the

These are in no particular order: Reach more than 20,000 likes on my Facebook page, which is at 15,000 already! This means I have less than a 10% reach rate, which is a little low. Still though, it's a start :) I'm really proud of that. Reach more than 2,000 followers on my Twitter account, which has 1,400+ already. I know I have at least 2,000 followers, it's just a matter of time before they reach all my followers. And yeah, my Twitter profile is a little... messy. Lazy summary: It's written in French and all my followers are in English. If you're not following me on Twitter or Facebook, you can do that by clicking the button on the top right of the page. It's so easy to do, and I love that Twitter and Facebook are still at year 5. To be honest, I've been a little lazy on this whole "Year 5" thing. I have nothing major or really new to report so it's been quiet around here. I will finally be taking a break for 4 days starting on Wednesday, December 21st. I'm taking a little break to rest and catch up on some TV shows. I'll be back on January 8th bff6bb2d33
