Even people who like the ideas of short-selling make statements about the possibility that it will lead to financial fraud, as described earlier. Without a strong, carefully designed centralized exchange, someone could hold an order for a few days (or a few hours) and cash out a large profit, leaving the market weaker and smaller traders and investors holding the bag. At the exchange level, a central exchange will need to be able to make sure that new traders are enabled, that there are no security and fraud problems on any of its platforms, and that it is able to deal with problems that are visible to exchanges in real time. This can be difficult to do, because it's not easy to supervise what is going on inside an electronic order book. At the market level, a central exchange will need to make sure that traders have all of the data they need to trade, and that there are no systemic problems such as market manipulation. This is the role that the "centralized exchange" model was meant to take on. The models for this role are the central commodities markets: Comex for gold and silver, LME for base metals, ICE for crude oil, and NYMEX for energy futures. In short, all of these physical exchanges are completely secure, and are monitored by powerful institutions. The thinking is that they should (and can) be more or less self-regulating and not require a lot of supervision. But we need to keep an eye on the electronic exchanges. Right now, they depend on the good will of their participants. If we are going to make markets more efficient, we need to be able to see every order, and ensure that they are legitimate. This is not at all easy to do, because these electronic exchanges make the orders opaque. Unlike the physical exchanges, the user doesn't see the inner workings of the order book as orders come in and prices change; they just see a price for their idea of what they want to buy or sell. As a result, there is
