A report by the National Crime Agency found agents working in the US had passed details of Russian election meddling and a plot to kill Russian diplomat Sergei Skripal to their British counterparts. One computer was left behind at a flat in London, and it was "fully infected with cyber-attack malware designed to intercept communications and extract sensitive data". The information was downloaded by the spies in London before they were eventually expelled from the country. The security services say the evidence was gathered in a joint operation with their British counterparts to help them combat foreign meddling in British politics. (Image: Getty) Communications between the spies were monitored by the British security services from March to August, according to the NCA. Their movements were tracked as well as the equipment they used. The spies then tried to cover their tracks by disposing of their computers and moving to a nearby apartment. According to the NCA, a section within MI6, the UK intelligence agency, tracked the movements of one of the spies to the flat they were using, before finally expelling them from Britain. Their connection to the Russian embassy was first revealed in November when a spy was detained and charged with "engaging in political activity without authorisation". (Image: Getty) The case against her was dropped last month and she has now returned to Russia. The incident happened just weeks after an MI5 officer was convicted of spying for the Russians
