FIFA 15 is available for pre-order now and is due out on 27th September. Amyloid- β is capable of increasing $[Ca^{2+}]_i$ and $[Ca^{2+}]_o$ via PLC and IP3 receptors in human neuroblastoma cells. The involvement of the calcium channel ryanodine receptor (RyR), the inositol 1,4,5-trisphosphate receptor (IP3R), and the sarcoendoplasmic reticulum calcium pump (SERCA) has been implicated in the deregulation of intracellular calcium concentrations ($[Ca^{2+}]_i$) in Alzheimer's disease (AD). Presently, we used intracellular Ca^{2+} and $[Ca^{2+}]_i$ measurements and a fluorescent probe 2',7'-bis(2-carboxyethyl)-5(6)-carboxyfluorescein acetoxymethyl ester (BCECF-AM) to determine the contribution of IP3R and RyR pathways in A β -induced Ca^{2+} deregulation. We observed that A β 1-42 was able to increase $[Ca^{2+}]_i$ by interacting with ryanodine receptors, calcium release channels, and IP3 receptors. This event was mimicked by the A β -derived peptide [A β 1-40]. Interestingly, the increase of intracellular Ca^{2+} was also observed in the presence of BAPTA/AM, a chelator that prevents endoplasmic reticulum Ca^{2+} release. Furthermore, A β 1-42 decreased the levels of ATP and the activity of the Ca^{2+} pumps in the ER, suggesting that these proteins are involved in the Ca^{2+} deregulation induced by this peptide. These results provide new insights into the mechanism of action of this peptide and its
