I would like to make an app that takes a video shot from this module, compresses it, and then saves it to the SD card. I'm new to Android development and so I need a bit of guidance on how to best approach this. My first thought was to use the jorbis library to compress the video, but the author of that library (Jeroen Frijlink) says that he only supports the camera on the Galaxy S, which I do not have. Then I found BitmapShader and I had an idea of making a fun app that takes a picture and then draws it as a bitmap over the currently playing video, but I have no idea if that will work. A: If you have a device without a camera, such as the Galaxy S, you could look into developing an OpenGL ES ES 2.0 library. You could then use this to access the camera's sensor information and create a frame capture using the library. OpenGL ES 2.0 is supported by all android devices and requires API 10 or higher. You can find a nice tutorial here and here. On top of that, you could use a non-GLES capture framework like simple capture or software based like demozoom. Q: Modify only a single attribute of an object using LINQ query I have a list of objects like this: public class City { public string Name {get; set;} public string Country {get; set;} } I also have an object of a specific city (for example, London): public class City_London { public string Name {get

Therefore, the combination of CT and MRI findings may be useful in determining the need for surgical intervention in patients with small lesions as opposed to patients with larger lesions, where conservative management is recommended. Consequently, we need to establish more precise diagnostic criteria for the radiologic diagnosis of PG and eventually for the differentiation between PG and other mucous-producing lesions. Our findings may be useful for establishing such criteria and for differentiating PG from other mucous-producing lesions. There are several limitations to this study. First, it included only 1 study population; hence, the findings should be interpreted cautiously. Nevertheless, we performed a meta-analysis to increase the credibility of our findings and to increase the validity of the data. Second, publication bias may have occurred owing to the exclusion of gray literature, such as conference papers, thesis, and so on. Third, CT and MRI studies were performed in different types of patients and with different time intervals of following up. Hence, a meta-analysis could not be performed, but the final decision to operate or observe the patient could be based on the experience of individual surgeons. Therefore, CT and MRI findings in the diagnosis and treatment of patients with PG should be further investigated. In summary, CT and MRI findings of PG revealed that PG lesions were pseudocystic with low CT attenuation
