Two-cell mouse embryos injected with antisense oligonucleotides against POU2F1, a gene required for the oocyte-to-embryo transition, are arrested at the morula stage. Early developmental events between fertilization and implantation, termed preimplantation development, are critical to producing a healthy, viable offspring. In the mouse, the onset of preimplantation development is correlated with the degradation of maternal histone H3-lysine 4 methyltransferase. Methylation of histone H3-lysine 4 is important in stabilizing transcriptional activation of embryonic genome activation (EGA) genes. To determine the role of H3K4 methylation during the period of EGA, we used morpholino antisense oligonucleotides to block the expression of Pre-implantation Embryonic Antigen 1 (Pou2f1), a gene encoding a POU domain transcription factor. The morpholino antisense oligonucleotides were injected into mouse one-cell embryos at the 16-cell stage. Injected embryos were cultured to the morula stage for determination of the developmental potential. Injection of 20 or 40 ng of morpholino was sufficient to block translation of Pou2f1 mRNA. The morpholino-injected morulae did not develop further after 12 hr of in vitro culture. These results demonstrate the importance of Pou2f1 during early preimplantation development. The present invention relates to a thin film magnetic head, particularly to a thin film magnetic head provided with two magnetic layers separated by an insulation layer, and an MR head formed by a combination of the thin film magnetic head and an MR element. In recent years, higher recording densities and smaller size have been demanded for magnetic read/write devices (such as magnetic disk drives) used for information processing apparatuses. As magnetic read/write devices are improved to have higher magnetic recording density, characteristics required of heads are also more strict. Such characteristics are readout efficiency and writing efficiency in a high-frequency range (the frequency thereof is generally 20 MHz or higher). To meet such requirements, a number of thin film heads have been researched and developed. Of those, in particular, there is
