Prediction of long-term potency of small spermatogenic tubules in men: a model for the evaluation of testicular sperm extraction. To explore the possibility of using the number of small spermatogenic tubules as a model for the prediction of long-term potency in men undergoing testicular sperm extraction. To test the hypothesis that the number of small spermatogenic tubules is predictive of long-term potency, we correlated the numbers of small spermatogenic tubules with long-term potency in 10 patients with azoospermia. Testicular sperm extraction and intracytoplasmic sperm injection. Chorionic villus sampling, prenatal diagnoses. Long-term potency. We obtained the following data from 10 patients who underwent testicular sperm extraction and intracytoplasmic sperm injection: the number of spermatozoa in the epididymal portion of the testes, the numbers of small (10 microns) and large (20-70 microns) spermatogenic tubules in the testicular portion, the number of spermatozoa in the seminiferous tubules, and the number of epididymal spermatozoa. Long-term potency (approximately 60 months). Data were analyzed for a correlation between the number of small spermatogenic tubules and long-term potency. The number of small spermatogenic tubules was significantly correlated with the number of spermatozoa in the seminiferous tubules. The results suggest that the number of small spermatogenic tubules is predictive of the number of spermatozoa in the seminiferous tubules. The prediction can be used to estimate the long-term potency of men undergoing testicular sperm extraction.
