I'm trying to write an lisp function that takes a list of the same length and checks to see if it is empty. If it's empty, the function returns a list containing NIL; if it isn't, the function returns a list of the same length but with a list appended to the end. I've been trying to use this function: (not (null list)) But it doesn't work. Here's the function: (defun list-contains (list) (cond ((null (not (null list))) (list NIL)) (t (not (null (not (null list))))))) The problem is that in the first cond statement, it doesn't seem to be checking the length of the list as it should. This is my output: CL-USER> (list-contains '(1 2 3)) NIL This is my question: how do I write a function that returns NIL if the list is empty? A: You can negate (null object) by wrapping it in list: (not (null (list x y z))) (which, according to the documentation, is a "version of the short-circuit conditional operator not-null") A: For your specific task I'd simply use: (member nil list) This will return nil if the list is not nil and non-nil if it is. You can then use either condition to determine if the list is empty or not. A: Using something other than (not (null (not (null...)))) for testing the emptiness of a list will work reliably in CLisp 2.5 and later, and it is much clearer and easier to understand. The (null (not (null
