Contrasting adaptive responses to high and low pH of a ciliate, Acanthamoeba polyphaga. Cells of Acanthamoeba polyphaga adapt to environmental stress by regulatory changes in gene expression. We examined the transcription of the P32 gene, a member of the Acanthamoeba histone gene family, in amoebae exposed to two stressors: a shift in environmental pH from 7.7 to 5.4, and a shift in medium osmolality from 500 to 1200 mOsm. After a shift in pH, most Acanthamoeba transcriptionally up-regulated the P32 gene by at least 60% (P Physical activity and its relation to locomotor performance in children. While physical activity (PA) patterns have been associated with bone mass in children and adolescents, direct evidence for their effects on physical performance is less clear. The aim of the present study was to examine possible associations between PA and some indices of locomotor performance. In a cross-sectional study a population of 14-year-old students (n = 603) from a northern Swedish city was assessed with respect to their PA pattern as well as a motor and a cognitive test. We found strong positive relations between PA and walking speed ($r = 0.75$) and endurance ($r = 0.55$), suggesting that the schoolchildren with the highest PA levels were also the fastest and strongest. Fitness tests were also correlated, especially in girls. There were no associations between PA and muscle strength. The girls performed better than the boys with regard to endurance ($p = 0.01$), but their performance was similar to the boys with respect to speed ($p = 0.36$) and strength ($p = 0.79$). In conclusion, the present findings, together with earlier studies, suggest that children who are highly physically active during childhood have better locomotor performance and that endurance performance seems to be more directly related to PA than is speed. More studies are needed to further
