Governor Perry also advocates for converting existing land-based oil rigs to floating ones, floating wind farms, and floating solar panels (which is a nice idea, except for oil rigs). Perry also favors rethinking America’s energy policies (“Our country is 30 percent dependent on foreign oil, which is the lowest it’s ever been in 70 years.”). However, Perry’s climate change response primarily targets his pet-projects. The line-item veto appears to be Perry’s most potent political tool, as he has vetoed many more spending measures that covered both sides of the ledger than line-item vetoes that cut budgets for things he disfavors. Perry’s line-item veto target list has significantly increased in the last three sessions. Here is a progress chart of where Perry has employed his “line-item veto,” as of mid-December, 2012: As you can see, Perry has vetoed fewer line-item budget items in the last three sessions than he did in 2011, 2010, and 2009 combined. This chart does not include some later line-item vetoes, including $148 million in funding for early childhood education programs and $5.7 million for Mexico's "Federal Initiative to Reduce Family Poverty" (which might be how Perry could offset the loss in funding to his pet "Promoting Excellence" program). But even if you don't count the State of Texas' non-budget spending to promote its energy policies, Perry's use of line-item veto appears to have declined dramatically from when he started his run for the presidency. With that
