Based on the track from the album By The Way, I Forgot To Say that this version of the track is totally ready to be played in Beat Saber! Collect all the black music clips, and get a cool, high score. You'll get a 20% discount with the code 'BILLIE' (only for owners of the Beat Saber app) Get this beat pack on the App Store: Get this beat pack on Google Play: Beat Saber - a game that allows you to experience the sounds of the songs in a virtual way, created by Swedish developer Beat Games. In the game, you need to slash with your cubes on the mirror-like glass that represents the surface of the drums. The purpose is to score the highest points that you can by clearing all the black discs. You can do this by connecting colored discs with matching colors, and by avoiding the green discs in order to be able to play the songs again. What's new in RPG Maker MV - Legends Of Russia - Battler Pack:

A concept that seems to be the darling of current VFX trends is the so called "Scanning Frustum Sub-Pixel Rendering", what is known as Scanline Sub-Pixel Rendering. The idea behind this, simply put, is that you are not rendering the final image, but calculate it on the fly, as you render. The cool thing is that since the data only depends on a few projection planes, very few "pixel"-points are actually required. A lot of work has been done with various aspects, however I am going to focus on why this is an interesting concept for compositing, albeit with numerous disadvantages compared to regular Sub-Pixel Rendering. ScanLine Sub-Pixel Rendering on several planes / renderings This animation shows how to render infinite angles, although realistically you should only do a render for a small, maybe 10 degrees worth of the whole sphere. You will see, that the actual rendering is not quite smooth, but this is impossible to achieve with this technique. There is also a frame rate drop, as you can actually cause the rendering to only compute the lines that are visible, which of course also leads to less work to be done. The reasons for most of this is that most virtual cameras, and real-world conditions do not actually have these projection planes perfectly lined up, which results in de-focusing and aliasing effects, which you will see later. The Basics The idea here is that we will just render into a depth buffer, nothing more than that. The idea here is that because of the SLSR technique, we have a look-up-table with every possible depth. So if I calculate the depth for each "point" as it advances, I find which depth I get, and then jump into my lookup-table. Let's dive in: Imagine that I want to render infinite points. Let's say I start at, and just render points until I compute an infinite render, which for example would be at. By doing so I render the points for which, and an infinite number of points for which. Now imagine I divide the world into slices. So each level is a slice, which is a little bit further than the previous level. I can split my world into levels, and then render each level on it's own, by rendering each slice. The render for level 3 of 3 of our example. First
