The highly regulated expression of multiple genes, such as insulin receptor, PGC-1, and UCP-1, underlies the profound effects of the (pro)insulin and leptin signaling pathways on energy homeostasis. Recent advances in the field have led to a general understanding of the functions of many of these genes, and to the identification of additional genes that may be influenced by these pathways. This new understanding has resulted in a view of the cell as a complex signaling machine that integrates signals from genes, environmental cues, nutrition and energy state, and organizes and executes the appropriate response. This review outlines a systems perspective of insulin and leptin signaling in vivo, integrating current knowledge of the effects of these hormones on energy metabolism at both the organismal and molecular levels.
