Sociocultural factors in the development of alcohol use disorders in a community: a longitudinal study of a cohort of healthy women and men. This study examined both genetic and environmental factors in the development of alcohol use disorders (AUDs) in young adult offspring. Data were collected between ages 17 and 25 years on 476 college students from 108 families participating in the first (age 17) and fifth (age 25) waves of a prospective study of women and men of Caucasian heritage. Cholesky decomposition of variance-covariance matrices of pairs of siblings indicated high genetic influences on parent-child concordance for alcohol use behaviors (as a composite) and for alcohol dependence (AD). Changes in genetic influences indicated moderate increases in familial transmission of alcohol use behaviors and of AD. Multiple regression analysis showed that the strongest predictors of subsequent development of alcohol use behaviors were, at age 17, the frequency of parental alcohol consumption, parental educational level, and peer groups. At age 25, the best predictors were peer groups, frequent alcohol consumption, and maternal educational level. The findings indicate both genetic and environmental factors in the development of AUDs and suggest that the environment, specifically peer groups, parental behavior and drinking, is of greater importance in determining AUD development in offspring than is the role of heredity.
