This was a surprising development, and one that sparked a number of questions about whether or not the FBI would conclude that Clinton's private server was inappropriately managed. The FBI famously never found a reason to prosecute Clinton for this conduct, which raised questions among those who argued that the White House should have prosecuted the former Secretary of State instead of Comey. There are two reasons why Comey did this tonight. The first is that this was inevitable, and the reason the FBI did not prosecute Clinton for this was because the agency did not want to burden a likely future Democratic nominee with prosecution. The second reason is that Clinton's team has been contacting FBI officials and informing them of emails that were found on Anthony Weiner, her husband's laptop. As it turns out, these emails are old. Weiner and Clinton separated in late 2010. Weiner pleaded guilty to sexting a minor in February of this year. The link between the Weiner laptop and Clinton's private server is not a link that Comey had planned on making. The retailer says it has stopped selling anything that can be used in "videotaped sexual entertainment" because "we believe it's not something most of us want to see". The Home Office is currently reviewing its guidelines for sex offenders, and following input from the victims and survivors of sex crimes and other parties, the Department for Communities and Local Government (CLG) is understood to have taken the view that sex offenders should not have access to internet-based entertainment such as virtual reality, camming, three way sex, virtual sex dolls, and other gadgets that could be used by paedophiles for sexual entertainment. The Prime Minister's official spokesman also confirmed the British authorities are now reviewing all recommendations made by the NSPCC so that new laws can be brought in. The move comes as the government is poised to tighten restrictions on sex offenders, with Cameron warning that the internet could be "the next breeding ground for paedophiles". People in the UK will now be given 60 days to dispose of their "adult toys" and other devices they are unlikely to need any more, as part of an attempt to stop the sale of things being used by paedophiles. Now, if you really want to get giddy, you can find your Oculus Rift and CV1 in the UK, as they have been banned from the shelves by Argos.
