The premise of the game is to navigate a scarab named Scarab through a maze of corruptions. The theme of the game is archeology. Tahitian blackbelly The Tahitian blackbelly or Tahitian blackbelly mullet (Mulloidichthys taiani), also known as the Tahitian mullet, Tauamuli, Taiana, or Taiwanese mullet, is a species of mullet native to the waters of the Southern Pacific Ocean. It is the only species in the genus Mulloidichthys, and one of two species in the genus Mulloidichthys, the other being Mulloidichthys taiani, the Tonga mullet. It is found from the Lau Islands northward and southward in the Southern Pacific. Its epithet comes from the word taiana, "blackbelly". Appearance and anatomy These fish have a black belly when adult. They are dark grey dorsally with black specks on the head and a blackish stripe along their spine. Juvenile fish have a white belly. Similar species The lowland blackbelly or Taiwanese blackbelly (Mulloidichthys immaculatus) is darker in colour, with a white belly, and shorter in length. Ecology Like the large Australasian blackbelly or long blackbelly (Mulloidichthys clarkei), the Tonga mullet is a bottom feeder that uses its caudal fin for propulsion. It is a very versatile bottom feeder; moving forward to take advantage of the food, pushing into the mud to search for food, and sometimes hiding. The fish feed on worms, crustaceans and other small organisms found in the intertidal zone. In fact, the larvae of other fish species such as the long-finned eel (Anguilla bicolor), yellowbanded bamboo shark (Chiloscyllium griseum), Shortjaw cichlid (Cichlasoma marginatum) and the glassy cichlid (Cichlasoma sallaei) have been reported to prey on juvenile Taiwanese mullets. In New Caledonia, the Taiwanese mullet is preyed upon by the turquoise sea bass (Holocentrus adscensionis) and the lionfish (Pterois) which bear its own stripes. In

What's new in Scarab Tales:

: Season 1 Coming out of the gate like an offensive juggernaut is probably not what you would call a bad thing to be in, but Thunder Road Entertainment has made it a different kind of bad thing. Between a hilarious voice cast, several humorous visual gags, and some truly smart satirical commentary on music and contemporary culture, “Scarebators: Season 1” of Thunder Road Entertainment’s “Scarab” is infinitely stylish, very different, and partially downright funny. “Scarab” follows live action series’ grounded in a form of character cross-graft between kids’ cartoons like “My Little Pony” and “The Fairly OddParents”, and the adult conversation pieces that have been done by “Tokyo Pop” like “Super Duper Sumo”. It’s a spoken-word/form/animation radio, created by a college student and the Qfabratt singer that uses the MumbleJams software. The format of the show works if it weren’t also so different. Set in a college campus, students and faculty are crossing paths throughout the programs, and each episode is structured to tell of a story that has already played out. Writer Adam King plays his “Nick Clooney”, and each character comes with a sort of life history arc - meaning they all retain the same character traits throughout their lives. But, as the show began, Nick Clooney was already told much of the story from the series’s opening segment, “The Headpath of Grief”, which is structured like a traditional story told with a medium where it is more commonly told - but in reverse order. This gives way to numerous mini-arcs and unique character builds to Nick’s life. This isn’t to say that each episode is a simulation of all the events from the very beginning through the very end. In fact, because Nick Clooney is recording each segment live, and the show is told out of order as the FM format is, each episode only hit upon things that are current in the show’s reality. In their first interview, the show’s creators explain this format, and the creator of “Scarab”, Adam King, also has some interesting insights to share. Fans of classic American sitcoms like “The Dick Van Dyke Show”
