For cell-based biomaterials research, it is crucial to identify the ligands in the cell culture media to meet the specific requirements. On the basis of localization microscopy, we visualized the surface topology of biologically functionalized phospholipid bilayers. We combined differential interference contrast and fluorescence imaging to visualize lipid monolayers and consequently performed image analysis on the free-standing lipid monolayer. In this way, we tracked the spatiotemporal evolution of the protein-bound domains. We propose a new method that distinguishes the single-blob

SysInfoTools 1.0.0.0 Full Version Free DownloadRenal vascular response to angiotensin II in anephric rats. Angiotensin II, a potent pressor agent, was infused at 20 micrograms/kg per min into rats with induced chronic anuria and treated with furosemide. Hemodynamic and renal actions of this pressor agent were compared with those from anephric rats treated with furosemide alone or with normal saline. The pressor response of the angiotensin II-anephric rats to a relatively low dose of infused angiotensin II was not significantly different from that observed in normal rats. Maximal dose-pressor responses to angiotensin II in anephric and furosemide-treated rats were similar to those obtained from normal rats. The findings indicate that renal vasodilatation to angiotensin II may be operative in anephric rats when the angiotensin II action is partially blocked.Replica breast prostheses use a soft silicone skin for providing external touch, feel and pressure sensation. The silicone skin is anatomically shaped and attached to a fluid filled pocket, such as a bellows or bladder. A fluid-filled pocket is defined by a flexible bladder or bellows which surrounds a liquid. The liquid is sealed and evacuated so that there is no trapped air. When a wearer of a prosthesis is in a relaxed or non-moving position, the liquid is positioned in a "neutral" position. This neutral position can generally be described as the center of gravity of the prosthesis. It is also known that the position and pressure of the prosthesis may be altered. For example, the wearer may lean forward or lean back to increase or decrease the pressure and the internal volume of the pocket, causing the cavity to assume a non-neutral position. The wearer may also apply increased or decreased pressure to the skin by moving the skin away or toward the cavity. However, a wearer of a prosthesis may find that if the wearer
