The field of the invention relates generally to deployable structures and, more specifically, to end joining of composite material joints to reduce stress concentration and accommodate joint displacements. End joining of materials is a common construction technique. A traditional construction technique is riveting. In some configurations, rivet heads are embedded in structural pieces of material. During use of the structure, the embedded rivet heads can be damaged, creating stress concentrations and compromising the strength of the structure. For example, some rivets are embedded in an interior surface of the structure at the center of the joint between two plate-shaped members. Due to the stress-transferring force between the two plate-shaped members, the plate-shaped members experience compressive stresses, which can cause deformation of the structure. Further, repeated loading of the structure, such as with wind-loading, can also cause deformation of the plate-shaped members. However, if the rivet heads are embedded within the interior surface of the structure, the embedded rivet heads are unable to withstand the above-mentioned compressive stresses and the structure experiences deformation. There is a need for improved methods and devices for end joining of composite material joints. Mach-Zehnder interferometer with a pentagram resonator for surface plasmon polariton detection. A Mach-Zehnder interferometer with a pentagram resonator is designed and investigated for surface plasmon polariton (SPP) detection. A rigorous coupled-wave analysis is performed to show the design principles. The proposed structure realizes a high transmission over the whole visible range. The transmission peak magnitude is greater than 70% for an incident wavelength range from 400 to 900 nm. The proposed device is easy to fabricate. Two modes of SPP resonance are identified in the transmission spectrum. The absorption spectrum shows that the two modes have different sensitivity to SPP frequency. A sensitivity of 3.5 nm/RIU is obtained by fitting
