In recent years, there has been an increasing trend toward higher integration and higher operation speeds of LSI (large scale integration). Along with this trend, a reduction in gate width of a MOS transistor is nearing its limit. Under these circumstances, attention has been paid to research on FETs (Field Effect Transistors) formed using a compound semiconductor material having a wider band gap than Si (silicon). One of the compound semiconductor materials in particular is GaAs, for which silicon MOSFETs are presently used. With this material, a gate length of 1.0 μm can be realized. In the case of the compound semiconductor FETs, normally, it is necessary to form a p-type GaAs buffer layer and an n-type AlGaAs etching stopper layer on a semi-insulating GaAs substrate. After selectively forming a source/drain region and a gate electrode, impurity ions are implanted into the substrate. When attempting to form a heterojunction bipolar transistor (HBT) using GaAs, a p-type GaAs buffer layer and an n-type AlGaAs etching stopper layer are formed on a semi-insulating GaAs substrate, and impurity ions are implanted into the substrate. After selectively forming a bipolar region in the substrate, a buffer layer is formed on a portion except the substrate, and an emitter electrode layer and a base electrode layer are formed on the buffer layer. This is described in, for example,
