Rail workers in South Australia have joined a national push to change the law after a teenager was killed by a train after a driver had allegedly drunk too much. Key points: Rail union says insufficient penalties in law make train drivers less likely to abstain from drink driving Rail union says insufficient penalties in law make train drivers less likely to abstain from drink driving Union says more than 200,000 drivers are responsible for driving a train, NSW the only state to allow on-duty drivers to drink Union says more than 200,000 drivers are responsible for driving a train, NSW the only state to allow on-duty drivers to drink SA is hoping to follow NSW's lead before 2016 election The SA Liberal Party's campaign promise to remove the driving and language offences from train drivers was the centrepiece of the party's election platform. But the Rail Union has hit out at the Liberal Party after the teenager's death, saying insufficient penalties in the law make train drivers less likely to abstain from drinking and driving. The driver of the train was one of the two accused, but has not been charged with drink driving. The 17-year-old boy died after a collision between a train and a car at the intersection of Montague Road and Barry Drive in Adelaide's north east on July 12. A train carrying timber derailed on tracks just after 7:00am, causing hundreds of people to be evacuated from nearby homes and businesses. The accident occurred when the driver of the train had allegedly been drinking. The front of a train derailed in Adelaide's north eastern suburbs, leaving tracks blocked. (Twitter: @SarahHinton85) Train drivers have special laws From 2017, all drivers will be subject to the same laws, including sections of the Road Safety Act and the Liquor Licensing Act, as all other drivers. However, the Rail Union says it's the same penalties for train drivers that don't apply elsewhere, leaving a loophole for them to get away with drink driving. Union spokesman Andrew Fraser said train drivers would be more likely to be caught by police, meaning they would be more afraid of getting caught. "The fines are such that, in most cases where they are actually caught doing it, it would be somewhere between two or three hundred dollars," Mr Fraser said. "There's no mandatory penalty, you know, it's a little bit of a laugh. "You've got to
