The survey included more than 3,000 osteopathic physicians, and all data are presented at the national, state and city levels. Osteopathic physicians rank high in patient satisfaction, and when their specialty is taken into account, they tend to have higher quality and lower severity illness than allopathic physicians. The study found that more than 60 percent of osteopathic physicians reported a good or excellent work-life balance, which was more than the proportion of allopathic physicians who shared this assessment of their jobs. Osteopathic physicians reported higher quality and lower severity illness than allopathic physicians. One in 20 osteopathic physicians had been covered by health reform in 2010, compared with one in 30 allopathic physicians. California osteopathic physicians showed a higher percent reporting at least one of the four indicators of poor health or job performance — less than six months of work, work-related back pain, multiple absences from work or major recurrence of illness. The report also offers a number of other findings related to osteopathic physicians. For example, the report found that, in five states, osteopathic physicians were the largest percentage share of all medical doctors in the state. The report also found that the poorest states for quality of care were those with the largest share of osteopathic physicians. This suggests that the relationship is not causal. It also found that osteopathic physicians have generally been more prevalent in urban than in rural areas.
