Jeremy Hunt said training cuts in the health service were “unprecedented” in the past 12 years. The health secretary, who took office in July, said funding pressures in the NHS had been under-estimated and would have to be tackled “head on”. And he said the government would not “go to back to the past” on health and education. The NHS in England received £1.2bn in cuts in the last spending review but overall funding has risen by 11% since 2010/11, while in health spending per head it has fallen from £2,117 in 2010/11 to £1,831 in 2015/16. ‘Sheer denial’ Mr Hunt told the Daily Telegraph that £3.2bn more than the government predicted was now budgeted for health spending, and that patient safety would not be put at risk. “There are cuts to jobs in the NHS, there are cuts to training, there are cuts to the number of midwives,” he said. “These are all unprecedented.” The NHS faces a “unforgettable challenge” to rebalance the NHS finances, given the pressures of rising demand and a squeeze on funding from other government departments, he said. Mr Hunt said that the National Audit Office had warned the NHS would need to save £20bn in the next five years if it was to keep pace with demand. Speaking at the Conservative party conference in Manchester, he said: “It’s no secret to anyone that funding has been squeezed in this parliament.
