Listeria monocytogenes 10403S wild-type strain is more virulent than the mutant 10403SdelMA allelic deletion strain in immunologically naive poultry. To determine if this strain difference is related to virulence in a different model, a sublethal dose of 10403S was administered to turkeys by the intravenous route. The 10403S mutant virulence level was approximately 4 log units less than the wild type. There were no 10403S mutant-specific differences in mortality, course of disease, bacterial levels in blood and tissues, systemic release of inflammatory cytokines, and the blood changes associated with shock. The disparate mortality and virulence of the 10403S mutant and wild-type strains are not due to differences in the ability of the mutant to survive in the environment in the plant and to translocate and replicate in the liver, brain, and spleen. This experiment indicates that wild-type L. monocy
