Save and Enjoy!An engineer who works for Nova Bus, the company that builds GO Transit's new fleet of vehicles, says that if he wanted to he could take a licence and weld a couple of key components on some trains and buses. Chris Bartlett, a technology transfer manager at the company that builds the new vehicles for the TTC, rattled off the tools he'd need to patch up a Toronto streetcar, an O.V.A. rail car, a bus and a GO train. "While it's an option, it would require a pretty substantial effort and investment to get that done," he said of the Toronto Transit Commission's plan to buy 90 new streetcars and move them out of Cobourg, Ont. "It's not a big project but it's something we'd have to have done." But Mr. Bartlett didn't see it as an option. Story continues below advertisement Related:Toronto streetcar maker clears first hurdle for Bombardier bid The TTC has hired a firm to study the possibility of building its own vehicles and chose one of two manufacturers to go forward with that plan, but a key hitch looms: the TTC has no experience in making transit vehicles. "We weren't even in the running," says Mr. Bartlett, noting that the bus or streetcar maker is usually part of the bidding process. Randal Huddart, chief mechanical officer at Nova Bus, said Toronto's chances of winning a contract to build any new vehicles are not good. "It's not in our plan and it's not something we're capable of right now," Mr. Huddart said. He said that building the new vehicles is an
