dungeons and whatnot. But the character devs are still figuring how to make them move (for a while their movement has been too slow) and how they'll be eventually presented. I can't wait for a smooth campaign. The character creator is filled with pure awesomeness. The prevalence of five potentially pathogenic bacteria in autopsy material. Q: How do you set up an owned private key and certificate? Now that I've successfully setup an SSL certificate for my JBoss application server, I'd like to generate a key/cert pair for use in the login script and to control who can log in and why. This is for a Java app running in Tomcat under Windows XP SP 2. Note that I'm not a Windows user or scripting nut, so I'm happy with Unix/Linux methods for generating or finding what I need. This is most easily done with openssl and openssl.exe in MS DOS. That's fine, but there are a few slight gotchas when generating a matching key/cert pair for Tomcat: openssl.exe asks for a random password, and doesn't include an option to save the key file after creating it. So how do you generate the key with password-protected options and store it? openssl.exe doesn't have much of an option to just debug the signing process, so how can I see what errors it's having? Edit: Cloning the openssl.conf from the openssl-0
