"Player movements are recorded as they would be in real life when making tackles or performing other actions," said Andrew Dannehy, FIFA 20's Design Director. "Every detail of the game, from the angle of the foot going into a tackle to the angle of the head going down after the collision, is recorded and used to set the animations. There's no compromise, no artificiality - it's all from the real data. The technology helps us get the ball in the right place, help the player move in a natural way and make sure that we've got the right depth of detail in the animations." The technology is designed to "to answer questions like 'if this was a player jumping off the endline in a mid-flight challenge, how does his body position change?' or 'how does this tackle look when the defender has an extra 5, 10, 15cm of separation?"; "All 22 players' motion capture data has been used to create a series of "hyperextension" animations, meaning that defenders and midfielders can extend their knees in slow motion to help them defend against low-ball attacks. "Over the last couple of years, we've looked at how players move," said the game's Lead Designer and Gameplay Director, David Rutter. "Our most detailed analysis has been looking at how they move on the ball. Being a defender it's important to be able to move around on the ball without compromising your physicality, and that's why we've seen defenders moving ever closer to the ground after getting their hip into the air. If you have the right depth of leg extension, you can almost glide over the ball. "There's a big technological leap here. We've done a series of tests with this, but you can just pick it up and play with it. As soon as you get your knee over the ball, the contact surface on your foot goes up or down, as well as your leg, and then we use that to animate further down the pitch. "We have higher and lower knee extensions and a response to the ball, so we can create a deeper level of animation that looks right, and does actually look like players are moving that way in real life.
