In 1992, the National Institute of Child Health and Human Development and the National Human Genome Research Institute published the report of the advisory committee on human genome mapping which advocated three consortia for molecular analyses of four or five candidate genes that may predispose to the polycystic ovary syndrome (PCOS). With this report, the molecular genetics of PCOS gained increased interest. During this time, a number of new clinical syndromes have been described that may be related to the PCOS syndrome. In addition, new genes have been identified that potentially contribute to several syndromes in which affected individuals have PCOS phenotypes. A number of new avenues of investigation into the molecular genetics of the polycystic ovary syndrome (PCOS) are being explored., we're here to help.
