Tracheal bronchiolo-alveolar carcinoma. A case report. The case of an 80-year-old man with tracheal bronchiolo-alveolar carcinoma is presented. This uncommon tumor, which has previously been reported only in the lung, must be distinguished histologically from other tracheal tumors. The most characteristic features of the tumor are the presence of two types of cells--the tumor cells and the epithelial cells lining the alveoli, which express cytokeratin but not alpha-fetoprotein. This blog is about the esthetics of the human face, and about its philosophical dimension. It is a result of my research on cosmetic surgery, aesthetics, and ethics. Visit the links on the right for details. Saturday, September 05, 2008 Pregnancy Hi there! Been a while since I wrote last. Here are a few thoughts about pregnancy and the raising of a child. The subject interests me, for no other reason that it is my future. So, these are jumbled thoughts. I may or may not flesh them out any further. Most women who are pregnant don't have much difficulty making aesthetic judgments about the state of their own bodies. Why? There is a lot of anecdotal evidence that women view their bodies as utilitarian, that is, for functioning. If that is the case, then there is no aesthetic problem with who looks what. Whether you look like a fully-formed adult and a good-looking one, well, who cares? The point is that you are alive, and you are alive. This is the reason that many women with breast problems are quite confident about what they look like. The point is that people are not perfect. One of the things that makes aesthetics about the esthetics of the human face are subjectivity and irregularity. That is, a person cannot be judged for their appearance. Rather, one person's aesthetic judgment is always relative to some other person or persons. This is the esthetic problem with pregnancy. It is going to be judged from two different points of view. It will be judged by the mother as a project that she is undertaking. The judgment will be made in terms of whether the birth is a success or failure, whether it was done "right" or "wrong". Then there will be a judgment by the child about her mother. Is she a good mother, what kind of a mother she is, and so forth.
