As shown in FIG. 1, a coffee preparing system may comprise a coffee grinding machine 10 and a coffee brewing machine 20. The coffee grinding machine 10 comprises a housing 12 and a grinding rotor 14 rotatably disposed within the housing 12. It is well known that, the grinding rotor 14 is often a disc with a plurality of coffee grinding members 16 formed on the periphery of the grinding rotor 14, and a number of camming members 18 formed between the grinding rotor 14 and the housing 12 are distributed at proper intervals. The grinding rotor 14 may be driven to rotate about its rotational axis by a motor through a bearing. The camming members 18 engage with holes of the grinding members 16 and thus are able to selectively rotate the grinding members 16 to coarsely grind coffee beans 21 in the housing 12 and grind the coffee beans 21 into powder. However, when the coffee beans 21 are ground to a certain degree, the temperature of the grinding rotor 14 is raised due to friction between the camming members 18 and the holes of the grinding members 16, and thus the grinding members 16 is heated up. Therefore, the temperature of the grinding rotor 14 may be too high for the coffee beans 21 to withstand, causing the coffee beans 21 to be damaged. U.S. Pat. Nos. 7,017,590 and 7,264,787 disclose a coffee grinding machine that comprises a heat transfer element disposed on the periphery of the camming member for transferring the heat generated by the camming member to the housing, and then the heat is dissipated from the housing. Therefore, it is possible to avoid the excessive temperature of the camming member, and
