Link: Å .. The seal produced by circumlaryngeal pressure is essentially a vacuum seal, with sufficient negative pressure to immobilise, compress and cushion the trachea and chest wall. Thus, during a prolonged CPR, the patient's circulation is terminated by a progressive loss of blood from the vascular bed due to the large area of contact between the circulating thoracic blood volume and the rigid larynx. It is usually considered that adequate compression is achieved when the capillary blood column height in the throat is less than the endothelial thickness of the cricoid cartilage.\[[@CIT6]\] The concept of venous return variation based on the degree of airway compression is largely based on the individual patient's circulatory response.\[[@CIT7]\] For example, during a prolonged CPR, an individual subject may have a progressive loss of blood secondary to airway compression (a little more blood loss), whereas another subject may have a progressive gain of blood secondary to the same degree of airway compression (a little less blood loss).\[[@CIT7]\] Whether ventilation is adequate at a given time depends on the degree of airway compression achieved and the degree to which a certain amount of distention of the vasculature occurs, the degree of venous return, the degree of ventilation, and the degree of hypoxia.\[[@CIT7]\] Because of the unpredictable nature of blood volume loss during prolonged CPR, it is difficult to adequately predict blood flow in an individual patient. Furthermore, the only instrument that can be used to accurately estimate circulatory status during a prolonged CPR is the ETCO~2~.\[[@CIT8]\] Recently, the concept of circulatory arrest has also received much attention. It is generally accepted that a patient in circulatory arrest is considered to be in a situation in which there is complete cessation of blood flow to the brain and to the body as a whole. In this situation, the cessation of blood flow is "total" and d0c515b9f4
