The kidney develops from mesoderm-derived nephrogenic stem cells within the metanephric mesenchyme. The earliest events in kidney development are the induction and determination of metanephric mesenchyme followed by the segregation of presumptive nephrogenic cells from the rest of the mesonephric mesenchyme. After this, differentiating nephrogenic stem cells proliferate and undergo specialized differentiation in order to form the three major components of the nephron, i.e. mesangial cells, glomerular and tubular epithelial cells. We hypothesized that the distribution of nephron progenitor cells reflects this cellular differentiation. In order to study the distribution of nephron progenitor cells, we immunostained sections of developing rat kidneys (8.5-16.5 gestation days) with antibodies against markers for the nephron progenitors such as prominin (CD133), parvalbumin (CD56), neuron-gial antigen 2 (NG2), epithelial (podocalyxin), and mesangial (PDGFRbeta) progenitor cells. Results were compared with the pattern of distribution of developing nephrons, glomeruli and tubules, as well as with the expression of markers for more mature nephron cell types, i.e. synaptopodin, neph b7e8fdf5c8
