The move is part of a trend that is pushing up-and-coming companies to eschew Bitcoin and Wall Street for opportunities in the so-called 'distributed' ledger technology, with 'blockchain' becoming the catch-all term for the bitcoin technology itself. Also read: JPMorgan Promises to Abandon Their Wildest Bitcoin Predictions Since the start of 2017, almost every established financial institution has taken a closer look at blockchain technology. The technology has sparked huge interest in the financial industry as it promises the world a whole new paradigm, in which a vast network of computers can track the flow of digital currency. But those claims, and the inroads blockchain technology is making into financial services, have been mocked as a farce by bitcoin miners, a group of highly incentivized entrepreneurs who help keep the Bitcoin network alive. IOTA, on the other hand, is seen as a legitimate contender to replace Bitcoin in the future. The company was founded in 2016 by David Sonstebo, a German developer who has worked in the game industry, and his chief technology officer Dominik Schiener, both from the Max-Planck-Institute for Software Systems in Germany. In October of 2017, the duo, both in their mid-20s, raised a whopping 1,300 BTC (now worth $35 million) to develop their so-called Tangle technology. Sonstebo said: "It's clear that Bitcoin and other cryptocurrencies have become the past. But if the Tangle becomes successful and starts to scale, it has the potential to become a new decentralized standard of money." The company has already opened up a mining pool in October and, in Q4, they will sell off all their coins for a small fraction of their current value. Mining entrepreneur has old firm going for funding He may have created the biggest mining company in the world, but mining entrepreneur and Crown Ltd co-owner Kevin Conroy is prepared to find new sources of funding. The former head of United Kingdom Mining agreed to sell his London-listed company to the ASX-listed coal-mining specialist for £8.8 million ($12.5 million) earlier this month. Conroy said he would use proceeds from the sale to fund a $200 million debt facility that has yet to be drawn down. His departure from United Kingdom Mining leaves co-owner Anthony Banks with £19.3 million worth of shares in the company after the purchase. "We have looked at various avenues, including putting more money into the mine, but it's not a great deal for us to put money into our own company at this point," he said. "We've been looking at options around the place, but if you look at the market it's a really challenging time for the mining industry at the moment." ASX-listed mining companies have suffered some of the greatest falls in share prices on the ASX. Most have had their credit ratings downgraded in the last year to junk status or ratings agencies have listed the companies as high-risk borrowers with substantial debt levels. United Kingdom Mining is also the most indebted of the ASX-listed mining companies, owing a market value of $1.3 billion. Other than a strong coal price, Banks said the business was performing "quite well" despite the economic conditions. "It was primarily driven by a price rally on the basis that the economic environment would become stronger, which of course the mining industry, and the coal industry in particular, would be stronger," he said. "Unfortunately we haven't seen that. "We haven't seen any improvement in the US, there's been some significant deterioration in Europe with Greece and Spain, that's obviously created headwinds for the UK economy." The company was down 0.5 per cent at $2.65 a share on Tuesday, with a market value of $1.34 billion. Banks said the company would continue to focus on building its stakes in Anglo American's Freeport mining operation in Queensland and in the giant Welgan mining project in Western Australia. "The existing shareholder base has been very supportive, and as a result I think that confidence
