INFOImproved bioconcentration and clearance of 1-naphthyl-naphthalene from the blood of fish exposed to sediments contaminated by industrial emissions in Japan. The bioconcentration and clearance of 1-naphthyl-naphthalene were measured in blood of fish exposed to sediments contaminated with 1-naphthyl-naphthalene. A laboratory experiment with fish (chameleon wrasse, Corynichthys andruzzii) that were exposed to naphthalene-contaminated sediment for 24 h was performed. Concentrations of naphthalene in the fish blood increased with increasing concentrations of naphthalene in the sediment. Concentration-time curves were fitted with a first-order kinetics model. Concentration ratios of fish to sediment were approximately 2.6 to 10.1, showing that higher concentrations of naphthalene in fish blood were obtained when sediments contained a higher concentration of naphthalene. The blood-air partition coefficients (K(b)) were estimated using an organic carbon distribution model that takes fugacity into account, and the blood-air partition coefficients were estimated to be  $1.1 \times 10^6$  (0.22 L/kg) at 10 microg/L and  $9.8 \times 10^6$  (1.9 L/kg) at 50 microg/L. Clearance rates (60 days) in fish exposed to 50 microg/L were 14.2 times larger than those in fish exposed to 5 microg/L. This study demonstrated the effectiveness of the kinetic approach to assess the bioconcentration and the clearance of organic pollutants in sediment-eating fish.
