Fouled Thunderface—first film from director Martin Scorcese It's no secret that bigtime Hollywood has two things going against it: the cost of making such films, and the requirements for health and safety on the set. When Scorcese first read the script for "Fouled Thunderface," he sent an advance copy of the screenplay to OSHA. "I guess I read it twice," he said of his response. "I spent a whole week on that film." Other than that, he just wanted to know how much the man and his assistant would eat, and what kind of toilet they'd use. Scorcese, who spoke at the OSHA forum, said his makeup artist has "a huge lunch box with her lunch every day." He also has "an assistant whose job it is to know the drinking water containers we use, and where they can be found." Scorcese was pleased to learn that there is a rest room available on the set, "and that it's clean," he said, adding that this posed problems for the crews if they went to the bathroom, because they'd have to walk through a long, narrow hallway, "so I told my production designer to put a door and windows on the hallway." Not surprisingly, Scorcese brought two toilets to the event. Both were used and are available to the public. Scorcese, who will be directing the new film "Hugo," told the audience about a time when the lighting equipment needed for a shot on "Thunderface" blew up, leaving him in a position similar to the lead character. "I had to come out of the movie and I had to tell the actors, 'OK, we're going to have to do it without the light.'" At the time, the crew, which usually works in groups of three, had seven people.
