Players will continue to move in real time with the capture system working overtime to keep up with changes in player positions and speed. Here's what fans can expect from FIFA 22 with this new technology: Players will now accelerate, change direction and decelerate in a fluid manner on the pitch. Players will now drift off the ball without unnecessary stutter. Players will now change direction smoothly on the pitch. Players will now accelerate and change direction more fluidly on the pitch. Players will now change direction smoothly on the pitch. Players will now change direction on the pitch more smoothly. Players will change direction more smoothly on the pitch. Players will accelerate less and change direction more smoothly. Players will now change direction more quickly. Players will now move in a more coordinated manner. "This technology allows players to access and exploit their natural movement patterns and will enable them to play in the most realistic way." Today's announcement is the biggest development FIFA has seen in years. The release notes don't mention motion capture suits, but all the real-life player data is being used to power the in-game physics engine to produce that much closer to the real thing. The motion capture suits for players are known as the KINECT (Kinect Interaction and Exploration of Neurons and Electronics) Motion Capture suits, and they are a portable solution for on-the-go, real-time analysis of player movement. When a player interacts with a virtual object in the FIFA game engine, he receives a signal from the suit that sends the data to FIFA. The analysis is performed in the cloud, and the data is sent back to the player's suit. I've used the feature in FIFA and it's pretty accurate. The analysis and correction takes around two seconds to complete. Since FIFA's match engine is updated and optimized over every new game, this will be one of the most significant innovations in the sport since the introduction of the goal.
