The present invention relates to a glass-fiber-reinforced resin-resin composite material, and more particularly to a glass-fiber-reinforced resin-resin composite material having both high mechanical strength and excellent heat resistance. The organic polymeric materials generally have poor resistance against organic solvents. Due to this characteristic, it is not possible to use them in the fields wherein they are required to be exposed to organic solvents such as organic solvents for processing e.g. printing inks. Also, since organic polymeric materials are not resistant to temperatures of about 150.degree. C., they cannot be used in the fields wherein they are required to be exposed to temperatures of about 150.degree. C. for a long time. On the other hand, inorganic materials such as glass, ceramics, silicon-containing polymers or the like are generally not sensitive to organic solvents and also are excellent in heat resistance. However, since they are not flexible, they have disadvantages that they are hard and brittle. The glass can be improved in flexibility by utilizing the heat-forming process, or by adding fine powder of a flexible material such as carbon, polyethylene, polytetrafluoroethylene
