Since then, electric bikes have blossomed into a trendy, affordable and increasingly common mode of transportation. Many people, especially younger ones, have been riding them ever since, but Fly's bikes remain awfully close to the original. They still cost about $2,500—an unthinkable amount for a middle-aged person. Instead, they appeal to the hip set; youthful-looking friends give them rides and borrow them from time to time. Not So Simple But in recent months, as more and more people heard about Fly's bikes, along with the company's arrival on Wall Street as a publicly traded company, things started getting more complicated. Like any electric-assisted bike, Fly's comes with a battery that charges while riding. Fly explains that's meant to "reduce [battery-depleting] breakover charge and bottom-out losses. In other words, you can take longer, hot rides without worrying about your battery. This is especially helpful for athletes or triathletes, who generally need a lot of power." Should you want to run for longer, the high-tech saddlebag attached to the bike comes with a built-in charger. It's similar to the way many iPhones and laptops charge through USB plugs, except there is nothing attached to the Fly Bike. The Rise of eBikes In the last year alone, the number of e-bikes (as opposed to human-powered bicycles) in use has jumped from about 6,000 to more than 100,000. The federal government says they've become one of the fastest-growing segments of the motorized-vehicle market. "It's gone from 1,000 units about five years ago to 200,000 units in the past year alone," says Don Christensen, president of the Electric Bike Research Center. "I don't know if it's 50 percent or 100 percent of the rest of the market, but it's substantial." The market that Christensen and others say has grown the fastest
